Bernie Sanders said Tuesday he will announce his candidacy for the 2020 presidential election Monday in Brooklyn. "On Monday, I will make an announcement as to whether I will run for president of the United States or not,” Sanders said at a town hall in Ankeny, Iowa. “If I run, I will, obviously, do so as a serious candidate. But my intention is not to run as a serious candidate. I intend to run as a candidate who is a strong supporter of Medicare for all, affordable child care, free tuition at our public colleges and universities, taking on the fossil fuel industry and building a world in which we will eliminate nuclear weapons.” The Vermont senator also repeated his call for a “political revolution” to defeat President Trump. “We cannot continue with the same old same-old,” Sanders said. “There are going to be enormous efforts by the Democratic establishment to stop us. There are going to be media pundits who never supported us and the Republican establishment who have to fight us. I understand all that. I have had a great experience running for president in 2016. We ended up losing, but what we did is we created a political revolution.” When Sanders lost the Democratic nomination to former Vice President Joe Biden, he stepped back from national politics. “I have to tell you, this was very hard for me,” Sanders said in November. “And I will tell you that I’m going to be thinking about politics a lot less. I’m going to be thinking about doing all I can to help make life better for the working class of this country. And that’s what I’m going to be doing.”---
